The Internet's largest free and public collection of Congressional Research Service Reports

Berkeley, CA – A team of coders and academics in the San Francisco Bay Area today announced the launch of CRSReports.com, a new website that provides free access to over 33,000 Congressional Research Service documents.

The Library of Congress' Congressional Research Service (CRS) staff produces nonpartisan and unbiased research on policy issues of congressional interest. These CRS documents contain information that is beneficial to many including: off the Hill members of government, policy professionals, journalists, academics and members of the public.

CRS report topics vary widely from Hill related procedure guidance, to persistent and fleeting national and global developments. Examples: Syria Climate Change Bitcoin Human Trafficking Women in Congress Net Neutrality Congressional Procedures

CRS is tasked with exclusively serving Congress and as such does not make its documents available to the public. However, members of Congress are free to distribute these documents at will. As a result CRS documents are deliberately released from Capitol Hill and make their way onto thousands of scattered websites across the internet. While no 3rd party website plays a role in creating CRS documents many of the larger CRS collections do charge the public, policy makers, businesses and our academic institutions to access them. CRSReports.com hosts the largest public collection of CRS documents and is dedicated to providing all users with free uninhibited access to these documents.

“We believe that the potential for these documents to elevate public discourse, enrich media reporting, and inform governance serves a greater purpose than our own economic gain.” - Founder Antoine McGrath
